Swiss Champion Finally Handed Trimming for Title by Joe Gans.

Frank Erne, who was the third man to hold the light-weight championship of the world under Marquis of Queensberry rules, was a native of Switzerland, and was born at Zurich forty-three years ago.

Erne's father was a wine grower and that may account for Frank's tremendous consumption of the juice of the grape, which often seriously interfered with his training.

Erne won the light-weight title by a decision over Kid Lavigne in a 20-round bout at Buffalo, May 3, 1899. He held the title about three years, Joe Gans becoming his successor.

Erne began his pugilistic career at Buffalo, Later he went to New York and took on George Dixon, getting a draw, although in a second bout he lost the decision to the colored boy. Beginning as a feather-weight, Erne soon grew into a light-weight and challenged Kid Lavigne. The first Lavigne-Erne battle resulted in a draw. Erne then went to California and knocked out Dal Hawkins in the seventh round at San Francisco.

After returning to New York Erne fought several bouts before he took
